

Some advertisements really catch my attention. For example, I enjoy ads that use good music or funny stories. When I see an advert with a catchy song or a famous person, I often remember the product and even want to try it. However, I sometimes realize that I don't really need it—I just like how it looks in the ad.

I think advertising aimed at children and teenagers should be more restricted. Young people can be easily influenced, and they might spend money on things they don't need or start feeling unhappy about themselves. Companies should be honest and responsible when creating their ads.

Overall, neuromarketing can be useful, but it should be used carefully and ethically.

Thanks for your post! It really made me think.
